thomson says that the question what it is to have a right precedes the question which rights we have and she therefore begins by asking why our having rights is a morally significant fact about us she argues that a person s having a right is reducible to a complex moral constraint central to that constraint is that other things being equal the right ought to be accorded thomson asks what those other things are that may or may not be equal and describes the tradeoffs that relieve us of the requirement to accord a right our rights fall into two classes those we have by virtue of being human beings and those we have by virtue of private interactions and law thomson argues that the first class includes rights that others not kill or harm us but does not include rights that others meet our needs the second class includes rights that issue from promises and consent and thomson shows how they are generated she also argues that property rights issue only from a legitimate legal system so that the second class includes them as well publisher
